5. Ludwig van Beethoven (1770-1827): Sonata for Cello and Piano No. 5 in D-Major, Op. 102 No. 2

(Beethoven's Op. 102 cello sonatas (No. 4 and No. 5) are considered works from his late period, which is generally seen as a transitional phase bridging the Classical and Romantic eras. While the pieces contain elements that foreshadow Romanticism, they are often classified by some experts as belonging more to the Classical tradition, albeit a highly innovative and experimental one.

Key details about Op. 102:

- Composition Date: The sonatas were composed in 1815.
- Period: They mark the beginning of Beethoven's "late period" (roughly 1815–1827).
- Characteristics: These works display traits that would become hallmarks of the Romantic era, such as deeply personal emotional expression, unconventional formal structures, and an increased interest in counterpoint (like fugues).
- Classification: The pieces do not fit neatly into a single category. They combine the formal structures of the Classical era with a harmonic and expressive complexity that profoundly influenced later Romantic composers like Schumann and Brahms.

Therefore, while they possess strong "Romantic" characteristics and helped usher in the new era, they are technically products of Beethoven's unique transitional late style, making the classification as a purely "Romantic period piece" a subject of some debate among music scholars.)
